

why you might want to be a part of the enviro collective...

- You've always thought you might want to get into activism but never really knew how to go about it.
 - You want to meet some gentle tree lovin' folk. University can be a hectic environment and it is pretty hard to get to know people. The Environment Collective is a swell place to begin.
- You miss the ozone layer and the air around uni makes you feel like you've been chain smoking champion ruby through a dry bong.
 - Capitalism reminds you of a bloated parasitic slug sucking the earth dry, & if it were a slug, you would like very much to mangle it with a pointy stick.
- You want to feel good about being part of a solution, as opposed to feeling guilt from being part of the pollution.
 - You want practical solutions for making change in your life, and your community. You are looking for activism based on seeing, hearing, and feeling the change you are making.
- You have a feeling Sandra Sulley is telling you darn stinkin' lies, and you want to find out about stuff that goes on in the world the mainstream media ignore.

What's a collective, Mungo?

Well Jengo, a collective is usually a bunch of kids who work together to achieve something... they might do something like start a food co-op... protest logging of old growth rainforest or lobby their local member to block a dodgy development.

Well who gets to be the boss then?

There is no boss... a collective is non hierarchical... everyone should get their go at holding the speaking gourde... obviously some members of the collective will be more experienced than others, but it will be their task to share that experience.

Cool... Does that mean we are anarchists?

Collectives also try to break down power structures and bureaucratic irrationality by encouraging autonomous organising and affinity groups...

Maybe Jengo... maybe not.
